Questions & Answers About politics and government a level

No	Question	Answer
1	What are the key differences between parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law in the UK?	Parliamentary sovereignty means Parliament is the supreme legal authority; its laws cannot be overturned by any other body. The rule of law, however, dictates that everyone, including the government, is subject to the law and no one is above it. While related, the rule of law provides a crucial check on the absolute power that parliamentary sovereignty theoretically grants.
2	How is the UK's uncoded constitution different from a coded constitution, and what are the implications of this?	A coded constitution is a single, authoritative document (like in the US), whereas the UK's uncoded constitution is derived from various sources, including statutes, common law, conventions, and works of authority. This makes it more flexible and easier to amend but can also lead to ambiguity and potential for political manipulation.
3	What are the main arguments for and against the UK adopting a fully coded constitution?	Arguments for include greater clarity, stronger protection of rights, and enhanced democratic accountability. Arguments against often cite the loss of flexibility, the potential for judicial overreach in interpreting a rigid document, and the difficulty of achieving consensus on what should be included.

4	How does the concept of 'checks and balances' operate within the UK's political system?	In the UK, checks and balances are less formal than in presidential systems. They include the House of Lords scrutinizing legislation, the judiciary interpreting laws, the media holding power to account, and the electoral process allowing citizens to remove governments. However, due to parliamentary sovereignty, the executive (government) often holds significant power over the legislature.
5	What is the role of the Prime Minister and Cabinet in the UK government, and what are the conventions that govern their power?	The Prime Minister is the head of government, appointing and dismissing ministers and setting the government's agenda. The Cabinet comprises senior ministers who collectively make key policy decisions. Conventions like 'collective responsibility' (ministers must publicly support all government decisions) and 'individual ministerial responsibility' (ministers are accountable for their departments) are crucial in shaping their actions and accountability.
6	How has the devolution of power to Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland impacted the UK's constitutional landscape?	Devolution has created a quasi-federal system within the UK, granting significant legislative powers to the devolved nations in areas like health and education. This has led to distinct policy approaches across the UK and raised questions about the balance of power between Westminster and the devolved assemblies, particularly concerning English representation and the future of the Union.
