Key figures often studied include Stanislavski, Brecht, Artaud, and contemporary practitioners, each offering unique insights into actor training, directing styles, and the very purpose of theatre.

Component 1: Interpreting and Performing Texts

This component typically focuses on the analytical study of dramatic texts. Students are tasked with dissecting plays from various periods and genres, understanding character development, plot structure, thematic concerns, and the playwright's intentions. The analytical depth required here goes beyond surface-level comprehension. Students learn to identify subtext, analyze dialogue, and understand the impact of stage directions and setting. A significant part of Component 1 often involves preparing and performing extracts from these plays. The examination for this component often includes both written analysis of a play studied and a practical assessment of performance work. This rigorous approach ensures that students develop a nuanced understanding of how dramatic texts function both on the page and on the stage. They might analyze set design, costume design, and lighting design as crucial elements in conveying meaning and creating atmosphere within a production.
